

Abstract

Method and apparatus for non-invasive measurement of the blood glucose concentration (or other selected physiological content) of a body tissue specimen by irradiating the specimen with modulated laser light, and receiving light re-emitted from the specimen to produce an electrical signal which controls the duration of laser energization and is decoded before operating a counter from a variable frequency pulse generator.

10

15